“We started with the idea that every touch and move during a match could be captured. FIFA 22 uses the physics that play out in a real match, together with the actions that players are able to take, and how they perform such actions. This allows for video-game-like moves in real-life, and it is the combination of all that data that gives the player an authentic experience,” EA Sports Motion Capture Lead, James Norton said. The new movement system in FIFA is built for realistic simulation of all game modes: Custom, Exhibition, FIFA International Cups, FIFA Confederations Cups, FIFA World Cups, and FIFA Club World Cups. The motion system has been developed by motion capture specialist technology company PM Studios, and is used by professional sports teams and film studios for such AAA titles as “Skyrim,” “Assassin’s Creed” and “Skyfall.” “We created FIFA 22’s movement system to enable the best gaming experience, and are constantly working to improve it. We believe that the game is at its best when the player is involved and when the action is authentic, and we are always working to provide that,” Norton added. There are 830 animations in-game, and 150 unique animations. Five leagues, including LaLiga, Ligue 1, the English Premier League, the Australian A-League, and the Chinese Super League, are supported. “Players will be able to experience all of the explosive power, fluidity and precision of the real thing, with better control over the on-ball actions of the players, including the ability to tackle, pass, shoot, dribble, take-on and hold,” EA Sports Technical Director, Kevin Cassidy explained. “In the long run, we believe our system will lead to more realistic team games, more on-ball action and better game-play when you are in control of a player.” FIFA 22 builds on the brand new player personality system called “Tackling Intelligence,” which combines key actions into five unique tackling styles that are specific to different playing styles. There are seven levels of simulation for tackling styles, which lead to in-game variations based on how physically fit players are. “Our goal with this system is to provide the tools for everyone to be able to play a style of football they want to play,💎

Different methods, using a modified Ag(+)-coated silica gel column with radio-fluorescence detection and an SDS-gel electrophoresis in polyacrylamide gel, have been developed to estimate the brain levels of glutamate in humans and rats. A capillary electrophoresis method has also been developed, using electrophoretic detection. On the basis of the results obtained by the three techniques, the sensitivity of the method is enough to follow changes in the brain levels of glutamate after some experimental conditions. We have also considered the possibility of evaluating the concentration of this amino acid in peripheral blood cells and they may find an application in the determination of some pathological conditions which involve an alteration in blood cells.
